

The book was found

The Calling: Tahirih Of Persia And Her American Contemporaries

Synopsis

The Calling by Hussein Ahdieh and Hillary Chapman describes Tahirih (Qurrat al- Ayn), the trailblazing female nineteenth century Iranian poet, theologian and religious-revolutionary leader in a fresh, new manner, juxtaposing and interweaving her life and work with that of her American contemporaries--Mother Ann Lee, Sojourner Truth, Susan B. Anthony, Lucretia Mott, Olympia Brown, Ellen White and Mary Baker Eddy--women whose existence she was probably not aware of, but who shared with her a spiritual bond and vision of progress and justice. In 1852 she was executed by a state fearful of her message. Her last words were You can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women.

Book Information

Paperback: 320 pages

Publisher: Ibex Publishers; 1st edition (March 21, 2017)

Language: English

ISBN-10: 1588141454

ISBN-13: 978-1588141453

Product Dimensions: 6 x 0.8 x 9 inches

Shipping Weight: 1.2 pounds (View shipping rates and policies)

Average Customer Review: 5.0 out of 5 stars 2 customer reviews

Best Sellers Rank: #1,046,895 in Books (See Top 100 in Books) #98 in Books > Religion & Spirituality > Other Religions, Practices & Sacred Texts > Baha'i #383 in Books > History > Middle East > Iran #776 in Books > Biographies & Memoirs > Historical > Middle East

Customer Reviews

"The Calling Tahirih of Persia and her American contemporaries " Dr. Dorothy Marcic Columbia University Championing women's rights has become more important in recent weeks since the US Presidential election, and you might think the fight for female justice started in the 1960's, or perhaps after WWI, when Women's Suffrage was pushed forward. But you'd be wrong. And we have Hussein Ahdieh and Hillary Chapman to thank for writing a comprehensive narrative of two simultaneous struggles for women's rights, both of which started in the mid-19th century. One of them is known by an early meeting in Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848 and the other began in Persia (now Iran) in the 1840's. Ahdieh and Chapman's book, The Calling, is engaging and illuminating. How many knew that the women's movement was born of women leaders and speakers in the First Great Awakening, that time of American evangelical religious fervor around 1740? Or how important the voice of female slaves was to the growing emergence of women's independent spirit? And then the shift to an as-yet unknown woman in Persia. Tahirih the poet was born in the women's wing of her family home and "grew up in a world bounded by the lattice work on the walls." Against tradition, her father had the courage to educate her, and she became well-known for her eloquence and mastery of many subjects. Added to her unique status was the fact that she became a nearly follower of what is now the Baha'i Faith, a religion that taught, even back then, that women should have equal rights to men. Moving back and forth between the two struggles in such distant lands, the authors skillfully illustrate the common themes of what might otherwise seem as disparate social phenomenon. The book reads smoothly, and the reader wants to keep turning the page to find out what happens. How unusual is such writing in a work as thoroughly researched and referenced as The Calling. Writing such as this is not easy, and yet the authors make it appear as effortless as an autumn leaf blowing in a chilly wind. If you think women's rights are important, or you are just curious about how women first started to aspire to equal justice, read The Calling. You will not be disappointed.

drdorothy.com Review by Judge Dorothy Nelson : I have finally finished reading "How long must I be restrained?" You and Hillary have created a masterpiece that will be a very special book for hundreds of years to come. You should win a Baha'i Pulitzer Prize for your accomplishment! The depth of your research is amazing. The rich details, both of Tahirih and her American contemporaries is unequaled. Although I was familiar with many of the Americans, I was uninformed about the importance of Sojourner Truth and the birth of spiritualism. I knew of Gobineau, but not of Renan, Bellcombe, Lessona, Cheyne, Iqbal etc. etc. etc. I also learned so much more about the importance of Martha Root and Laura Barney. I could go on and on, but I will simply say your research and writing is extraordinary. I have absolutely nothing to suggest that would make this book any more exceptional than it is. With loving admiration and profound respect for your accomplishment.

Dorothy Nelson Review by Dr. Amrollah Hemmat

The Calling is a book of tears and laughter, yet factual and rich with insightful historical, social and psychological analysis. It brings to life mesmerizing but forgotten stories of the 18th- 19th century heroines of America and their contemporary Tahirih, a martyred woman of Persia--their spiritual ecstasy and zeal, high-mindedness, courageous undertakings, unwavering faith, and steadfastness. Through the power of their pen, or by passionate public speeches, these women introduced novel humanitarian discourses and altered, globally and permanently, the public opinion about their gender; and they did so at a time when the female gender was not allowed to be visible or heard in the public sphere, valued only for "passivity, emotionality, and physical weakness." Their support of various causes, be it women's suffrage, abolitionism, Indian rights, opposition to capital punishment, temperance, or the support of the marginalized populations, led not only to the eventual realization of many of their altruistic objectives, but also to a change in the social status of women, allowing them to go to universities, preach, and fill jobs they had never done or been permitted to do--journalism, nursing, teaching, factory and clerical work and even being employed as spies and soldiers. This was merely a humble beginning for the redemption of half of the population of the world from their eternal condemnation. The book demonstrates, with detailed historical evidence, how these groundbreaking social changes took place in the cultural context of messianic beliefs--driven by the expectation of the Christians in the US and the Moslems in Persia for the advent of the Day of the End, the era of the fulfillment of eschatological prophesies. The timing cannot be more appropriate for the publication of this invaluable book: at the brink of the 21st century, when East is East and West is West no longer, when we witness, globally, women of various races, ethnicities and creeds, raising their voices for the cause of justice, compassion and love, echoing Tahirih's calling of hope and faith: Injustice will be convicted by the power of justice. Ignorance will be defeated by the power of thought. Everywhere the carpet of equity will be rolled out. Everywhere the seeds of amity will be scattered. At this point in history when attempts for global unity, sympathy, justice, and equity feel ever so trying--as challenging as they were two centuries back--may Tahirih's far reaching sagacity inform the vision of all women and men of insight and faith: The reign of disunity will be vanquished from all regions, Diverse peoples of the world will become one nation. Review by Prof. Michael Penn have read, with enormous delight and humility, your learned and beautifully written chronicle. And while I am in no position to judge the accuracy of the history, I can say that the whole work has stimulated within me a hunger to learn more about the period and about the great women whose lives you have so richly captured. I especially love the way that you use the voices of powerful women to tell the story of their own rise to social and spiritual power in the two cultural contexts of the east and west. I love also the rhetorical cadence and power of your text. The narrative is propelled by an energy that is rare in historical works of this kind and I want to congratulate you and Hillary for this inspired contribution. It is evident that the confirmations of God are flowing down upon you, even as waters flow from the mountains to irrigate the receptive valleys below. Please accept my best wishes for continued success and remember me in your prayers as I remember you in mine....Review by Dr. Duane K. Troxel. The authors of this book- Hussein Ahdieh and Hillary Chapman celebrate one of the world's pre-eminent champions of the emancipation of women and basic human rights. Such a book could not be timelier. Today the topic of basic human rights--especially the rights of women--is passionately debated in the halls of government and centres of worship everywhere. Both Ahdieh and Chapman visually set the scene of women in society in both Persia and America. Women's rights, privations, and obligations are explored. Tājihirih (pronounced taw-hair- eh), meaning "The Pure One" was born Fātimah Baraghānī- inc. 1817 in the northern Persian city Qazvīn. From childhood Tājihirih exhibited deep piety and intellectual brilliance; so much so that her father, a high ranking cleric, permitted her to undertake higher Islamic studies which were then reserved to men alone. What draws the Western reader into this setting is how the authors play off the role of women in Persia against that of American women in the 19th century. Not unlike a compelling screenplay they cut back and forth from Persia to America where we easily sympathize with the sufferings and privations of women in both societies. In those days Persian women were invisible and mute at that time. American women were neither invisible nor mute but had little outlet for their talents and faculties. They were the 'weaker sex' confined to the tasks of home-making and child-rearing, in ways not unlike their Persian counterparts. In both Persian and American society the spirit of a new religious awakening was sweeping through society. Women responded to this new calling which inevitably brought them into conflict with men, who dominated government and religion in both settings. In the West it was the "Great Awakening" and the anticipation of the "Second Coming of Christ". In Persia there was an expectation among followers of some Muslim denominations of the appearance of a "Promised One". Religion became the vehicle that propelled women in both societies to make advances for their sex. Back and forth the authors take us from Persia--as we follow the progress of Tājihirih--to America where women are slowly insinuating themselves into popular causes and writing and speaking to defend those causes. And back to Persia where we learn about the youthful Bājb, and the incredible response to His Teachings which included the now eloquent poetess Tājihirih. Surprisingly it was the separation of church and state in America that created public education and gave a place to girls to be educated equally with boys, at least in lower education. In America freedom of religion was guaranteed by The Bill of Rights. In Persia people were not free to believe as they wished if those beliefs ran counter to interpretations of a powerful Shi'ih clergy who could order them arrested and even killed. Ahdieh and Chapman review the fascinating account of William Miller, who ultimately predicted Christ's return in October 1844 and whose Millerite Movement initially attracted thousands. Back in Persia 1844 was the exact year in which the Bājb arose to proclaim the Advent of the Promised One of All Religions was at hand. "The Bājb had not come to renew Islam by reviving the old traditions and institutions but by bringing a new divine revelation to reinvigorate the inner lives of people.".....It is tragic to relate how Tājihirih prepared herself for her martyrdom by dressing as a bridepreparing for her bridegroom and giving expression to these deathless words: "You can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women."This book should be part of every high school and university literature course the issues it raises should be discussed today, as the station of women is still pathetically below that of men in nearly every aspect of life."The Calling Tahirih of Persia and her American contemporaries " Dr. Dorothy Marcic Columbia University Championing women's rights has become more important in recent weekssince the US Presidential election, and you might think the fight forfemale justice started in the 1960's, or perhaps after WWI, whenWomen's Suffrage was pushed forward. But you'd be wrong. And we haveHussein Ahdieh and Hillary Chapman to thank for writing a comprehensive narrative of two simultaneous struggles for women's rights, both ofwhich started in the mid-19th century. One of them is known by an earlymeeting in Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848 and the other began in Persia (now Iran) in the 1840's. Ahdieh and Chapman's book, The Calling, is engaging and illuminating. How many knew that the women's movementwas born of women leaders and speakers in the First Great Awakening,that time of American evangelical religious fervor around 1740? Or howimportant the voice of female slaves was to the growing emergence ofwomen's independent spirit? And then the shift to an as-yet unknownwoman in Persia. Tahirih the poet was born in the women's wing of herfamily home and "grew up in a world bounded by the lattice work on thewalls." Against tradition, her father had the courage to educate her, and she became well-known for her eloquence and mastery of manysubjects. Added to her unique status was the fact that she became a nearly follower of what is now the Baha'i Faith, a religion that taught,even back then, that women should have equal rights to men. Movingback and forth between the two struggles in such distant lands, theauthors skillfully illustrate the common themes of what might otherwiseseem as disparate social phenomenon. The book reads smoothly, and thereader wants to keep turning the page to find out what happens. Howunusual is such writing in a work as thoroughly researched andreferenced as The Calling. Writing such as this is not easy, and yet the authors make it appear as effortless as an autumn leaf blowing in a chilly wind. If you think women's rights are important, or you arejust curious about how women first started to aspire to equal justice,read The Calling. You will not be disappointed. drdorothy.comReview by Judge Dorothy Nelson :I have finally finished reading "How long must I be restrained?" Â You and Hillary have created a masterpiece that will be a very special book for hundreds of years to come.Â You should win a Baha'i Pulitzer Prize for your accomplishment!The depth of your research is amazing.Â The rich details, both of Tahirihand her American contemporaries is unequaled.Â Although I was familiarwith many of the Americans, I was uninformed about the importance of Sojourner Truth and the birth of spiritualism. I knew of Gobineau, but not of Renan, Bellcombe, Lessona, Cheyne, Iqbal etc. etc. etc. I also learned so much more about the importance of Martha Root and Laura Barney. I could go on and on, but I will simply say your research and writing is extraordinary. I have absolutely nothing to suggest that would make this book any more exceptional than it is. With loving admiration and profound respect for your accomplishment. Dorothy Nelson Review by Dr. Amrollah Hemmat The Calling is a book of tears and laughter, yet factual and rich with insight -- Tahrih Review by Prof. Michael Penn have read, with enormous delight and humility, your learned and beautifully written chronicle. And while I am in no position to judge the accuracy of the history, I can say that the whole work has stimulated within me a hunger to learn more about the period and about the great women whose lives you have so richly captured. I especially love the way that you use the voices of powerful women to tell the story of their own rise to social and spiritual power in the two cultural contexts of the east and west. I love also the rhetorical cadence and power of your text. The narrative is propelled by an energy that is rare in historical works of this kind and I want to congratulate you and Hillary for this inspired contribution. It is evident that the confirmations of God are flowing down upon you, even as waters flow from the mountains to irrigate the receptive valleys below. Please accept my best wishes for continued success and remember me in your prayers as I remember you in mine.... -- Duane K. Troxel Review by Dr. Duane K. Troxel. The authors of this book - Hussein Ahdieh and Hillary Chapman celebrate one of the world's pre-eminent champions of the emancipation of women and basic human rights. Such a book could not be timelier. Today the topic of basic human rights -- especially the rights of women -- is passionately debated in the halls of government and centres of worship everywhere. Both Ahdieh and Chapman visually set the scene of women in society in both Persia and America. Women's rights, privations, and obligations are explored. Tāj-e-hirih (pronounced taw-hair- eh), meaning "The Pure One" was born Fātima Baraghānāfā- inc. 1817 in the northern Persian city Qazvāfā- n. From childhood Tāj-e-hirih exhibited deep piety and intellectual brilliance; so much so that her father, a high ranking cleric, permitted her to undertake higher Islamic studies which were then reserved to men alone. What draws the Western reader into this setting is how the authors play off the role of women in Persia against that of American women in the 19th century. Not unlike a compelling screenplay they cut back and forth from Persia to America where we easily sympathize with the sufferings and privations of women in both societies. In those days Persian women were invisible and mute at that time. American women were neither invisible nor mute but had little outlet for their talents and faculties. They were the 'weaker sex' confined to the tasks of home-making and child-rearing, in ways not unlike their Persian counterparts. In both Persian and American society the spirit of a new religious awakening was sweeping through society. Women responded to this new calling which inevitably brought them into conflict with men, who dominated government and religion in both settings. In the West it was the "Great Awakening" and the anticipation of the "Second Coming of Christ". In Persia there was an expectation among followers of some Muslim denominations of the appearance of a "Promised One". Religion became the vehicle that propelled women in both societies to make advances for their sex. Back and forth the authors take us from Persia--as we follow the progress of Tahirih --Duane K. Troxel

In their forthcoming book "The Calling: Tahirih of Persia and her American Contemporaries" authors Hussein Ahdieh and Hillary Chapman celebrate one of the world's pre-eminent champions of the emancipation of women and basic human rights. Such a book could not be timelier. Today the topic of basic human rights--especially the rights of women--is passionately debated in the halls of government and centres of worship everywhere. Both Ahdieh and Chapman visually set the scene of women in society in both Persia and America. Women's rights, privations, and obligations are explored. Tājihirih (pronounced taw-hair-eh), meaning "The Pure One" was born Fātimah Baraghānī in c.1817 in the northern Persian city Qazvin. From childhood Tājihirih exhibited deep piety and intellectual brilliance; so much so that her father, a high ranking cleric, permitted her to undertake higher Islamic studies which were then reserved to men alone. Even as a youngster she won a reputation for scholarship and debate. What draws the Western reader into this setting is how the authors play off the role of women in Persia against that of American women in the 19th century. Not unlike a compelling screenplay they cut back and forth from Persia to America where we easily sympathize with the sufferings and privations of women in both societies. In those days Persian women were cloistered at home and sequestered behind robes called chadors when out in public. Women were invisible and mute at that time. American women were neither invisible nor mute but had little outlet for their talents and faculties. They were the "weaker sex" confined to the tasks of home-making and child-rearing, in ways not unlike their Persian counterparts. In both Persian and American society the spirit of a new religious awakening was sweeping through society. Women responded to this new calling which inevitably brought them into conflict with men, who dominated government and religion in both settings. In the West it was the "Great Awakening" and the anticipation of the

ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å“Second Coming of ChristÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å•. In Persia there was an expectation among followers of some Muslim denominations of the appearance of a ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å“Promised OneÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å•. Religion became the vehicle that propelled women in both societies to make advances for their sex. Back and forth the authors take us from PersiaÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å• as we follow the progress of TahirihÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å• to America where women are slowly insinuating themselves into popular causes and writing and speaking to defend those causes. And back to Persia where we learn about the youthful BÃƒÂ¡b, and the incredible response to His Teachings which included the now eloquent poetess TÃƒÂ¡fÃƒÂ¡hiri. Surprisingly it was the separation of church and state in America that created public education and gave a place to girls to be educated equally with boys, at least in lower education. We learn that by mid-19th century American girls are in public schools on a par with their male counterparts. In America freedom of religion was guaranteed by The Bill of Rights. In Persia people were not free to believe as they wished if those beliefs ran counter to interpretations of a powerful ShiÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å„cih clergy who could order them arrested and even killed. Ahdieh and Chapman review the fascinating account of William Miller, who ultimately predicted ChristÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å„cs return in October 1844 and whose Millerite Movement initially attracted thousands. Back in Persia 1844 was the exact year in which the BÃƒÂ¡b arose to proclaim the Advent of the Promised One of All Religions was at hand. Back in Persia TÃƒÂ¡fÃƒÂ¡hiri had found an ideal outlet for her passion and eloquence: poetry. The authors make judicious use of TÃƒÂ¡fÃƒÂ¡hiriÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å„cs poetry to express her sentiments and flights of spiritual ecstasy. For example, she champions the cause of the Promised One with lines such as these: Lovers! Creation veils his face no more! Lovers, look! He himself is visible! Order, justice, law are now possible. Minds in darkness now burn light with knowledge Tell the priest. Shut your books! Lock the temple!ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å“The BÃƒÂ¡b had not come to renew Islam by reviving the old traditions and institutions but by bringing a new divine revelation to reinvigorate the inner lives of people.ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å• A corrupt ShiÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å„ci clergy attempted to slander TÃƒÂ¡fÃƒÂ¡hiriÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å„cs character and morals. The BÃƒÂ¡b Himself stepped forward declared her pure and one of His ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å“Letters of the LivingÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å„c. By mid-century in the U.S.A. women ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å“were participating and playing important roles in all the major social reform movements: the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance (1826), the American Peace Society (1828), the American Anti-Slavery Society (1833), and the American Female Reform Society (1834).ÃƒÂ¢Ã  ¬Ã  Å• It is tragic to relate how TÃƒÂ¡fÃƒÂ¡hiri prepared herself for her martyrdom by dressing as a bride preparing for her bridegroom. So frightened were Persian authorities of a backlash that would result from her daytime execution that she was ordered strangled in the darkness of night. Before her execution she gave expression to these deathless words: "You can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women." The authors of "The Call" skillfully weave the existing fragments of Táhirih's life into a seamless tapestry of U.S., Persian and Bahá'í history. This book should be part of every high school and university literature course. The issues it raises should be discussed today; as the station of women is still pathetically below that of men in nearly every aspect of life. Dr Duane K. Troxel, Evanston, Illinois

REVIEW by Robert Harris 21 March 2017

The Calling: Táhirih of Persia and her American Contemporaries

The Calling is an amazing book about the worldwide emancipation of women. Women colleagues of mine (and thousands of others who have worked ceaselessly to advance the global safety, education, status of women) should be pleased that this tightly-woven, 308 page homage to brave women leaders, was written by two men. Hussein Ahdieh, born in Iran, is a respected educator in New York City. Hillary Chapman is a teacher, poet, writer and songwriter, born in Washington. Imagine! Accomplished and published male researchers and writers, devoting their powerful talents to tell a story of women in the 1800s, women from wildly diverse circumstances, who were "called" to confront the intractable opposition to equal opportunities for women. This writing team has a history of vividly telling the stories of many powerful and successful women in previous books: Awakening, A Way Out of No Way, and "Abdu'l-Baha in New York. Here, however, their entire focus in The Calling shines their powerful research laser-beam on the legendary leaders of gender equity in the West, and introduces many to a compelling and transformative religious and literary figure, Táhirih. This should be a film! What a swirl of activity! Change was at hand! Amid the backdrop in America of the "Great Awakening," the revivalist movements, the Second Coming fervor, the abolitionists, and Seneca Falls, we meet women who were, for the first time, speaking in public before audiences of women AND men. They were the founders of religious movements, suffragettes, reformers, novelists, journalists, opponents of slavery, war and alcohol. You will meet women such as Ellen G. White, Mary Baker Eddy, Mother Ann Lee, Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Sojourner Truth, Lucretia Mott, Lucy Stone, Dorothea Dix, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Sarah Moore Grimke and her sister Angelina, Mary Ann McClintock, Antoinette Brown Blackwell, Olympia Brown, Lizzie Doten, Cora Hatch, Fannie Burbank, Elizabeth Lowe Watson, Paula Wright Davis, Harriet Hunt, and Ernestine Rose. In a total rupture of traditional roles, they were to be found on stages, at podiums, organizing conferences and regularly quoted in the newspapers of their day. These luminous names are some of the agents of change of what we, today, consider to be western civilization. They were the mighty stirrers of the cauldron of change as society itself was being re-formed. Across the world, in many ways a totally different world, practically alone, was Tahirih, a brilliant Persian woman who was most rare because she was literate. She wrote poems, boldly delivered fiery speeches directly to men; a recognized leader whose brazen methods provoked tremendous agitation within and without of the infant religion that would soon be known as the Bahaï Faith. She personally and openly challenged every convention of civil behavior known in the entire Middle East. Essentially she believed herself to be an equal with men, and she did not hesitate to exercise her birthright as a human being. Her searing story of challenging what is, to this day, a totally male-dominated culture, is meticulously documented by the gifted Ahdieh and Chapman, with the help of some glorious translations of her famous poetry. The authors construct a compelling narrative of her life and her ardent desire to free women from the ancient shackles of orthodoxy and ignorance. Her vision, her struggle, and her eventual murder have inspired many girls and women in Iran and beyond; artists, authors, musicians, and even human rights lawyers have been motivated by her spirit and her story. Tragically, poetically and powerfully, even her shameful execution gives her an opportunity to express her hopeful spirit. As she is strangled, she utters her dying words: "You can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women!" The episodes that juxtapose East and West are knitted together artfully in The Calling. These stories serve as a reminder that hundreds of millions of human beings live their daily lives in constraints physical, psychological, political, religious and traditional. Too many have their feet bound, are kept hidden and veiled, are married as children, are mutilated at puberty, are denied education, are silent prisoners within their own lives. The entire human race is in great need of emancipation not just women are suffering. All of humanity pays the price for this loss of opportunity. I am so proud of these two men, who continue to raise their talented voices to rid our world, once and for all time, of the scourge, the shame, and the virus of prejudice and gross inequality. Robert Harris Princeton, New Jersey

Download to continue reading...

The Calling: Tahirih of Persia and her American Contemporaries A Journey through Persia, Armenia, and Asia Minor, to Constantinople, in the years 1808 and 1809: In which is included, some account of the ... Jones ... to the court of the King of Persia THE COLD CALLING SECRET: Discover the NEW ground-breaking cold calling techniques that get results! Readable on Kindle,

PC, Mac or iPad AUTHENTIC COLD CALLING: The Path to Fearless, Effective Cold Calling Calling Cards: Uncover Your Calling Daughter of Persia: A Woman's Journey from Her Father's Harem Through the Islamic Revolution Akiane: Her Life, Her Art, Her Poetry Higher States: Lawren Harris and His American Contemporaries American Psycho (Vintage Contemporaries) Girls Like Us: Fighting for a World Where Girls Are Not for Sale, an Activist Finds Her Calling and Heals Herself The Sociable Sciences: Darwin and His Contemporaries in Chile (Palgrave Studies in the History of Science and Technology) The Symphonic Repertoire: Volume 4. The Second Golden Age of the Viennese Symphony: Brahms, Bruckner, Dvork, Mahler, and Selected Contemporaries Purcell and His Contemporaries: Keyboard Pieces by Masters of the 17th Century (Kalmus Edition) Studies in Russian Music: Rimsky-Korsakov and His Contemporaries Brother, I'm Dying (Vintage Contemporaries) Autobiography of Red: Vintage Contemporaries Series Nobody's Fool (Vintage Contemporaries) Native & Foreign Virtuosos: Selected Works of Zimmerman, Alkan, Franck, & Contemporaries (Piano Music of the Parisian Virtuosos, 1810-1860 Series) The Invisible Bridge (Vintage Contemporaries) Unaccustomed Earth (Vintage Contemporaries)

Contact Us

DMCA

Privacy

FAQ & Help